him personally in a very brusque and clever manner.

4. In connection with the lecture, the question arose as to the amount of remuneration Vyshinsky should be given for the lecture. Those who had asked him to lecture were afraid of hurting his feelings by offering him too little, and if they offered him too much, it was feared he would take them to task for recklessly spending public funds, because he was the prosecutor of the USSR. Finally he was offered 250 rubles with the statement that this was the maximum that the organization pays for the lecture, and Vyshinsky accepted through his secretary.

5. Khrushchev, Nikita Sergeevich - In 1935 Khrushchev replaced Kaganovich as the secretary of the Moscow Oblast and City Committee. If Kaganovich appeared to be a cultured individual, Khrushchev certainly gave an entirely different impression -- that of a "muzik." He betrayed his low culture through his very crude manner of speech.

Khrushchev sought popularity among the children and it was his idea to organize the regional parks of culture.

6. Kaganovich's security was handled according to certain prescribed patterns. His visits were not preceded by NKVD; they merely accompanied him wherever he went. Khrushchev, on the other hand, was guarded quite differently. In the morning of his expected visit, two NKVD men arrived at the park and established a strict vigilance. They immediately requisitioned the telephone and kept the line open to Lubyanka until after the visit.

7. Mikoyan, Anastasy I - the auditorium of the Polytechnical Museum was assigned to the Commissariat of Foreign Trade for a large meeting at night. It was a closed session restricted to party personnel only, and the speaker was Mikoyan. Two NKVD agents arrived in the morning and requested me to show them all exits, all cellars, and attics. They immediately proceeded to work out measures of protection for Mikoyan. After the lecture, ardent Party members came out with high praises for Mikoyan. In general, Mikoyan enjoyed more popularity than Kaganovich and Khrushchev.

8. Shvernik, N M - during the parade of the Physical Culture Committees of the Trade Unions he made a speech to which no one listened. Later on Shvernik came to a little building in the park where refreshments were being served. He gave the impression of being a very gray individual; as gray as his speech had been. This was particularly noticeable since he was in a crowd of very interesting people with many military men such as Marshal Blucher.

10. He lived in a very modest apartment, as well as in the Government House on the Bolotnoy Square. Yudin is quite a chess man, but plays rather poorly. He is of Jewish origin, with a very high forehead indicating intelligence. At that time he had reddish hair.

11. Yudin is without doubt a most ardent Communist, not only a confirmed one, but also belonging to the group of Mitin and Pospelov, which is a group of theoreticians working on the theory of today's Marxism. There was also a certain Mints in that group (later a member of the Academy) who at that time was the editor of the "History of the Red Army" and the "History of the Civil War," or something of that nature. Although it appeared from the outside that Yudin, Mints, and Mitin closely followed the same line, actually they were competing with each other

12. Mints gave one the impression of being a very reserved and gruff person. Yudin, on the other hand, endeavored to create an impression of a cultured and sociable man, but always tried not to waste his time unnecessarily.
